

Not this Christmas

Cabin Fever is beginning to set in as we approach the days of the Winter Solstice, and the family gatherings that are planned for the traditional holidays. Many have set their faith and future on honoring Christmas traditions, where from childhood we have been indoctrinated and bribed into the tales that abound on this elaborate celebration.

Yet none of the stories will focus on the facts that Mythra was a Persian king that declared himself to be the sun god, and enacted the ancient Baal tradition of ornamenting and lighting his grove of trees at night, as if they were lighted by the sun. The servants of his kingdom would offer gifts under his trees on Mythra's well recorded birthday of December 25th, as they praised him with songs. Then Emperor Constantine adopted this favorite of the heathen traditions, and decreed this date to be the birthday of god.

With just a few diggings of research, we can find that the true birth-date of the Priest from Galilee was on the same day as one of the commanded holidays that were written by Moses. This is an amazing coincidence, that it is commanded to be celebrated as a Holy Day of a new birth, and the sounding of Silver Trumpets. This Feast of Trumpets is followed with a harvest festival that continues for a whole week, with a promise that these days will set the tone of your blessings for the next year.

You can study, clarify, and explain these findings to even the finest of teachers, but they always prefer to follow and embellish their fables and customs, instead of adopting the straight and narrow truth. Do you think that our families will ever wake up from being duped into following a false tradition? Probably not this Christmas!

Get more details on revealing mysteries, at Theorybin.Com.